

Alsace-Lorraine

By Elizabeth Vlossak

Alsace-Lorraine was a border region located between the Rhine River and the Vosges Mountains. Its role in French wartime propaganda, its geographic location, and its tumultuous recent history all combined to give the region a distinct experience of the First World War. When the war ended, Alsace-Lorraine, a part of the German Empire since 1871, was returned to France.

Table of Contents

1 Alsace-Lorraine between France and Germany, 1871-1914

2 A Borderland at War

2.1 Soldiers

2.2 Battlefields

2.3 Home Front

2.4 Propaganda

3 The End of War and the Return to France

Notes

Selected Bibliography

Citation

Alsace-Lorraine between France and Germany, 1871-1914

Alsace-Lorraine, a geopolitical amalgam consisting of the former French departments of Bas-Rhin, Haut-Rhin and Moselle, was annexed by the newly-unified German Empire following its victory over France in 1871. The change of nationality, imposition of Germanization policies, and arrival of 120,000 German settlers to the so-called Reichsland ("imperial land") had at first been opposed by local notables and religious leaders who clung to the hope that France would one day reclaim its "lost provinces". Francophile elites continued to promote French culture and language under the guise of Alsatian regionalism, but by 1914 most of the nearly 1.9 million inhabitants in the region had resigned themselves to their fate. Alsace-Lorraine had been relatively well integrated into the German Empire, and a new constitution in 1911 had granted it more autonomy,<sup>[1]</sup> although tensions had flared up in 1913 during the infamous Zabern Affair.<sup>[2]</sup>

A Borderland at War

Soldiers

In general, the war was greeted in Alsace-Lorraine with indifference.<sup>[3]</sup> Nonetheless, nearly 380,000 Alsatian and Lorrainer men fought for Germany. These recruits tended to be viewed with suspicion by the German High Command, which decided in March 1915, after a spate of desertions, that soldiers from Alsace-Lorraine would serve in the German interior or, more commonly, on the Eastern Front or in the navy.<sup>[4]</sup> Desertion rates remained relatively high.<sup>[5]</sup> Thousands of men from Alsace-Lorraine fled to Switzerland and France, and approximately 17,500 volunteered in the French army.

Battlefields

Several major military offensives took place in the region. The battles of Sarrebourg and Morhange destroyed parts of Lorraine in mid-August 1914. Earlier in the month French troops had taken Mulhouse, but had been pushed back by a German counter-offensive by the end of August. The French nonetheless maintained a foothold in Alsace for the duration of the war. In 1915, the Vosges were the site of the particularly brutal battles of Hartmannswillerkopf and the Linge, which became the site of a large French war memorial, museum and cemetery.

Home Front

Like the rest of the German Empire, Alsace-Lorraine's home front experienced great hardships and privations, including martial law, food shortages, and rationing. In areas located in relative proximity to combat zones, private property was requisitioned, forests and vineyards were destroyed to set up fortifications, and local residents were evacuated. Thousands of refugees arrived in Strasbourg. By 1917, civilians in urban centres suffered from a lack of basic necessities, a situation that allowed Spanish influenza to take an enormous toll a year later.<sup>[6]</sup> Unemployment and inflation also devastated the region. Most factories were moved to the German interior, investment in local industry dried up, and remaining capital was transferred into military production. Female employment was especially hard-hit by the collapse of textile production,<sup>[7]</sup> prompting working-class Alsatian women to relocate to other parts of the Reich to work in munition factories.<sup>[8]</sup>

Ethnic tensions in the region exacerbated local discontent. Although men and women worked tirelessly for the war effort, German fears of disloyalty and treason extended to Alsace-Lorraine's civilian population. Germanization policies were reinvigorated, with Governor Johann von Dallwitz \(1855-1919\) declaring in 1914 that an "iron broom" would remove anti-German sentiment from the region.<sup>[9]</sup> The use of the French language was banned. Thousands of inhabitants were imprisoned for a variety of offences, from singing the Marseillaise or wearing a cocarde, to spreading false rumours or providing intelligence to the enemy. Thousands more who were considered pro-French were placed in "preventative detention" camps.

Propaganda

Although France had not gone to war specifically to win back Alsace-Lorraine,<sup>[10]</sup> the region nonetheless became an important symbol in French and other Allied wartime propaganda. Posters, pamphlets, patriotic songs and plays often exaggerated the Germans' mistreatment of the region, and called for the "liberation" of France's "lost sisters".<sup>[11]</sup> Yet fears that some Alsatians and Lorrainers were dangerously pro-German prompted French military authorities in the occupied zones around Thann, Masevaux and Altkirch to intern local inhabitants in camps across the country.<sup>[12]</sup> Stories of the camps were used by the Germans to discredit the French, but ultimately Alsace-Lorraine did not feature in German wartime propaganda.

The End of War and the Return to France

In November 1918, in the chaos of Germany's defeat, soldiers' and workers' councils were established in Strasbourg, Colmar and Mulhouse. Within days they were disbanded, as French troops marched into the region, to the cheers of local inhabitants exhausted by years of privation. This enthusiasm was understood by the French as an unofficial plebiscite in favour of the region being returned to France. But the challenges of reintegrating Alsatians and Lorrainers into the French nation would prove far more complicated than anticipated.

Caught between France and Germany, Alsace-Lorraine's experience of the First World War is poignantly commemorated by the war memorial in Strasbourg's Place de la République, in which a grief-stricken mother cradles her two fallen sons.

Elizabeth Vlossak, Brock University

Section Editor: Mark Jones

Notes

1. ↑ Grandhomme, Jean-Noël (ed.): Boches ou Tricolores. Les Alsaciens-Lorrains dans la Grande-Guerre, Strasbourg 2008, p. 25.
2. ↑ Schoenbaum, David: Zabern 1913. Consensus Politics in Imperial Germany, Boston 1982.
3. ↑ Fischer, Christopher J.: Alsace to the Alsatians? Visions and Divisions of Alsatian Regionalism, 1870-1939, New York et al. 2010, p. 107.
4. ↑ Grandhomme, Jean-Noël: Les Alsaciens-Lorrains sur les fronts orientaux en 1914-1918. Service, captivité, "triage" et rapatriement, in: Revue d'Alsace 125 (1999), p. 188.
5. ↑ Ziemann, Benjamin: Fahnenflucht im deutschen Heer, 1914-1918, in: Militärgeschichtliche Mitteilungen 55 (1996), pp. 35-36.
6. ↑ Grandhomme (ed.), Boches ou Tricolores 2008, p. 25.
7. ↑ Wahl, Alfred: L'Alsace contemporaine, 1871-1939, Wettolsheim 1977, p. 87. See Table 1 in: Daniel, Ute: The War from Within. German Working-Class Women in the First World War, Oxford et al. 1997, p. 43.
8. ↑ Harvey, David Allen: Constructing Class and Nationality in Alsace, 1830-1945, Dekalb 2001, p. 120.
9. ↑ Bruant, Benoît: La Guerre des images, 1871-1945, in: Saisons d'Alsace 48/128 (1995), p. 79.
10. ↑ Becker, Jean-Jacques: L'opinion publique française et l'Alsace en 1914, in: Revue d'Alsace 109 (1983), p. 129; see also Becker, Jean-Jacques: L'opinion publique. Un populisme? Issued by Persée, online: http://www.persee.fr/doc/xxs\_0294-1759\_1997\_num\_56\_1\_4493 (retrieved: 21 September 2016); Joly, Bertrand: La France et la revanche (1871-1914), in: Revue d'histoire moderne et contemporaine, 46/2 (1999), pp. 325-347.
11. ↑ Vlossak, Elizabeth: Marianne or Germania? Nationalizing Women in Alsace, 1870-1946, Oxford 2010, pp. 190-199.
12. ↑ Farcy, Jean-Claude: Les camps de concentration français de la Première Guerre mondiale, 1914-1920, Paris 1995, pp. 51-60.

Selected Bibliography

Fischer, Christopher J.: Alsace to the Alsatians? Visions and divisions of Alsatian regionalism, 1870-1939 New York 2010: Berghahn Books.

Grandhomme, Jean-Noël (ed.): Boches ou tricolores? Les Alsaciens-Lorrains dans la Grande guerre, Strasbourg 2008: La Nuée bleue.

Kramer, Alan: Wackes at war. Alsace-Lorraine and the failure of German national mobilization, 1914-1918 in: Horne, John (ed.): State, society, and mobilization in Europe during the First World War, Cambridge; New York 1997: Cambridge University Press, pp. 105-121.

Vlossak, Elizabeth: Marianne or Germania? Nationalizing women in Alsace, 1870-1946, Oxford; New York 2010: Oxford University Press.

Wahl, Alfred / Richez, Jean-Claude: L'Alsace entre France et Allemagne, 1850-1950, Paris 1993: Hachette.

Citation

Vlossak, Elizabeth: Alsace-Lorraine, in: 1914-1918-online. International Encyclopedia of the First World War, ed. by Ute Daniel, Peter Gatrell, Oliver Janz, Heather Jones, Jennifer Keene, Alan Kramer, and Bill Nasson, issued by Freie Universität Berlin, Berlin 2016-10-21. DOI: 10.15463/ie1418.10984.

License

This text is licensed under: CC by-NC-ND 3.0 Germany - Attribution, Non-commercial, No Derivative Works.