

Version 1.0 | Last updated 08 October 2014

Baltische Landeswehr

By Jarosław Centek

When Latvia felt endangered by the Bolsheviks they called for German help, since Germany had assisted in clearing the country from the Bolsheviks before. However, very soon tensions between the Latvians and their helpers became apparent and the Allies decided that the “Baltische Landeswehr” should come under the British command.

Table of Contents

- 1 The Baltic Region
- 2 The Baltische Landeswehr \(Baltic Territorial Army\)
- 3 Campaign in Latvia
- 4 Baltische Landeswehr without Germans
- 5 The Importance of the Baltische Landeswehr

Selected Bibliography

Citation

The Baltic Region

After the November Revolution of 1917 the Bolsheviks came to power in Russia, but were confronted with two problems: they had to defeat the “white” counter-revolutionary forces and repel an Allied intervention. At the same time they had strong aspirations to export their revolution to other countries – and therefore started to deploy their forces to the West, threatening Ukraine, Poland and the Baltic States. Since the Baltic States were occupied by the Germans, Kārlis Ulmanis \(1877-1942\), head of the Provisional Government of Latvia, asked for German help. The Germans provided war materials and foreign volunteers obtained Latvian citizenship.

The Baltische Landeswehr (Baltic Territorial Army)

The Baltische Landeswehr (Baltic Territorial Army) was originally supposed to have eighteen companies. However, they did not have enough local volunteers and instead filled the ranks with Germans. The attempt to attract soldiers from the Scandinavian countries also failed.

In mid-January 1919 the Baltische Landeswehr consisted of approximately 1,200 soldiers; two months later it had fifteen infantry companies (three of them in Libau and one Latvian company at the disposal of the Latvian Minister of War). The Baltische Landeswehr also had a machine gun company, an engineer's company and a platoon of armored cars.

Campaign in Latvia

On 1 February 1919 Major General Rüdiger von der Goltz \(1865-1946\) became commander of all German troops in the region. Upon his arrival, the Bolsheviks occupied most of Latvia and were approaching Liepāja, which was defended by remnants of the former German 8th Army, known as the "Iron Brigade". Although the Baltische Landeswehr existed, it was still a small force that had not yet reached its full potential.

The Germans attacked and managed to capture Kuldīga. Von der Goltz aimed to conquer all of Courland, as he thought this was the best way to protect Eastern Prussia against the Bolshevik threat. On 3 March 1919 the German forces launched a major offensive, Operation "Tauwetter" (Operation Thaw). The Baltische Landeswehr began its operation on 13 March and proceeded to the north, where they captured Jelgava. They did not coordinate their attack with von der Goltz, but it was still successful and the losses were not heavy (seven officers and thirty-seven enlisted personnel).

The success in Courland, however, made the situation more complicated; after the Bolshevik threat disappeared, the Latvians were worried about becoming a German colony. In April 1919 the Germans overthrew the Latvian government and inserted Andrejs Niedra \(1871-1942\) as Prime Minister. Meanwhile Ulmanis left for Estonia. The Entente powers became concerned about the situation.

Nevertheless, the operations continued and Riga was chosen as the next target. The attack started on 23 May 1919, when the Baltische Landeswehr crossed the swamps and cut off the Bolsheviks' retreat route. Because the Red Army had concentrated most of its forces in the southern region, leaving the Daugava line with weaker defenses, the Baltische Landeswehr was able to capture Riga.

A short time later a fight broke out near Cēsis between the Baltische Landeswehr and the Estonians who were occupying the northern part of Latvia. The Estonians complained about the incident at the Conference of Ambassadors in Paris. Meanwhile, the Baltische Landeswehr lost the battle and had to retreat.

Baltische Landeswehr without Germans

On 3 July 1919 a truce was signed at Strasdenhof near Riga between the Baltische Landeswehr and Latvia. According to the treaty, if the Baltische Landeswehr were to continue to exist, all citizens of the German Reich would have to leave its ranks. The Landeswehr was transferred to the Latvian government, and a new commander was appointed, the British Lieutenant-Colonel Harold Alexander \(1891-1969\). The Latvian battalion and troops formed by Baltic-German prince Anatoly Pavlowich Lieven \(1872-1937\) were excluded from the Baltische Landeswehr.

General Rüdiger von der Goltz allowed his soldiers to join the ranks of the “West-Russian Volunteer Army”, which was commanded by Prince Pavel Bermond-Avalov \(1877-1974\). The German unit within Avalov’s force was known as the “Deutsche Legion” (“German Legion”). In December 1919 the “Deutsche Legion” was disbanded after it was defeated by the Latvians and was forced to withdraw into East Prussia.

The Importance of the Baltische Landeswehr

In the early phases of the Latvian war for independence German and Baltic-German support for the Latvians was crucial. However, the Germans were more interested in building a German zone of influence in Latvia than in helping the Latvians to gain independence. This led to an open conflict with Ulmanis’ government, resulting in Ulmanis expelling the Germans from Latvia. Without German support, the Baltic-Germans were unable to dominate the Latvians, who were supported by Great Britain. The Baltische Landeswehr ultimately ended up under British command.

Jarosław Centek, Nicolaus Copernicus' University

Section Editor: Piotr Szlanta

Selected Bibliography

Forschungsanstalt für Kriegs-und Herresgeschichte: Der Feldzug im Baltikum bis zur zweiten Einnahme von Riga, Januar bis Mai 1919, Berlin 1937: E. S. Mittler & Sohn.

Goltz, Rüdiger von der: Meine Sendung in Finnland und im Baltikum, Leipzig 1920: K. F. Koehler.

Kriegsgeschichtliche Forschungsanstalt: Die Kämpfe im Baltikum nach der zweiten Einnahme von Riga, Juni bis Dezember 1919, Berlin 1938: E. S. Mittler & Sohn.

Paluszyński, Tomasz: Walka o niepodległość Łotwy 1914-1921 \(The fight for Latvia's independence 1914-1921\), Warsaw 1999: Bellona.

Citation

Centek, Jarosław: Baltische Landeswehr , in: 1914-1918-online. International Encyclopedia of the First World War, ed. by Ute Daniel, Peter Gatrell, Oliver Janz, Heather Jones, Jennifer Keene, Alan Kramer, and Bill Nasson, issued by Freie Universität Berlin, Berlin 2014-10-08. DOI: 10.15463/ie1418.10039.

License

This text is licensed under: CC by-NC-ND 3.0 Germany - Attribution, Non-commercial, No Derivative Works.